This text provides students with an introduction to journalism, bringing together academic research and professional perspectives on the industry. It examines the context in which journalism has developed, and the external and internal processes that shape its role and activities. It looks at the kind of people within the industry, the organisational settings within which people work, the constraints which shape the nature of the news product and the relationship between reporters and their sources in the writing up of a story. An ideal starting-point for anyone thinking of becoming a journalist or studying courses on the subject.
