Designed for children just learning to read, the books combine John Bianchi's wonky cartoon animals with a simple, repetitive text by children's author Frank B. Edwards. These two patterned stories are built around groups of key words that give young readers confidence to read aloud. As they master the text, children enthusiastically read the books again and again -- delighting in the zany plots and their own ability to read. By adding subtle touches of humor throughout the stories, Edwards and Bianchi ensure that adults and children alike will not grow bored from repeated readings. When a lonely, little frog arrives at the zoo, he is disappointed that all the other animals seem too busy to welcome him. As the animals rush past, he calls out, "I am new. May I play with you?" But each one tells him, "Not now. I am going to a party" and rushes past. Disappointment, however, turns to delight when the zookeeper explains that everyone is going to a party for their newest friend. "Who is your new friend?" asks the frog. "Our new friend is you". announces the entire group who shower the newcomer with gifts, decorations and cake.
