Gifford Tate, well-known Falmouth painter, and Edwin Garland, a local businessman, had been inseparable companions until Tate's death several years ago. Now his paintings are much in demand, and each year, a work not previously shown is sold at a London gallery. When Garland dies of a heart attack, no one is suspicious--until the evening of the funeral, when his son is shot dead and Wycliffe is faced with a seemingly motiveless killing. Then another relative disappears, and the most promising clue is an artists' pigment called Winsor Blue. Wycliffe finally identifies the motive behind the crimes--but is it too late to prevent another death?
