When facing a life-challenging or even terminal illness, it's all about being normal. That's what kids and teens want for themselves and from the people around them. With wit, wisdom, and courage, young people ages 7-21 tell in their own words what it's like to be ill while trying to live each minute of their daily lives. Their true stories offer hope and insight to anyone touched by serious illness; their advice is of value to all those who know, love, and treat young people with illnesses or disabilities. For families, friends, classmates, and teachers of affected children and teens; for colleges that offer classes in disability studies; and for doctors and hospitals who want to share hope with their patients.
