CHAPTER [it Prince ;hun il0nwy of the red-gold hairi¼Œ the Princess Eilonwy br>Daughter of Angharad Daughter of Regat of the br>Royal House of Llyr, ~,as leaving Caer Dallben. Dall- ben himself had so ordered it; and though Tardn s heart was suddenly and strangely heavy, he knew there was no gainsaying the old enchanter s words. On the spring morning set for Eilonwy's depár- ture, Taran saddled the horses and led them from the stable. The Princess, looking desperately cheerful, had wrapped her few belongings in a small bundle slung from her shoulder. At her neck hung a fine chain and crescent moon of silver; on her finger she wore a ring of ancient craftsmanship; and. in the fold of her cloak she carried another of her most prized possessions: ˈthe i¼Œ golden sphere that shone at her command with a light brighter than a flaming torch. Dallben, whose face was more careworn than usual and whose back was bowed as though under a heavy burden, embraced the girl at the cottage door. \"You shall always have a place in Caer Dallben,\" he 9 ©³©¥Ŏש¥Oש¥Oש¥Oש¥Óש¥Ó • ' © § O §
