The transition economies of Central Asia are faced with the most daunting challenge that modern capitalism offers: the move from vassal pseudo-states of the former Soviet Union to competitive nations, some even members of the World Trade Organization. This book explores the first fifteen years of economic emergence and assesses the capabilities of these countries to transform their economies into competitive, market-driven systems. It is the first of its kind and will be highly useful for scholars, policy makers and donor agencies interested in Central Asia.
