Whether you are a veteran manager or just received your first management position, you naturally want to do well. All managers desire to excel, yet so many struggle. But one thing is for sure: just about all managers Shoot Themselves in the Foot from time to time - some, of course, more than others - because they violate one or more of the management no-nos included in this book. In his consulting practice, the author has worked with literally hundreds of managers to identify ways they can improve their overall performance and that of the people they manage. By first recognizing and then avoiding the ways managers Shoot Themselves in the Foot, any manager will manage more effectively. Many managers report more positive results almost immediately. You're certain to relate to Bill Lee's straightforward writing style, which puts sometimes difficult-to-understand business principles into everyday terminology that's easy to understand and to implement in your organization.
