One morning while I was shaving&iuml;&frac14;&OElig; looking into the mirror squinting through the soap and the steam&iuml;&frac14;&OElig; I thought about put-

ting my glasses on&iuml;&frac14;&OElig; the better to see my face. Of course that is a

dumb idea: Would I shave over or under the stems? And the steam that fogged the mirror would fog the lenses even worse.

But I bet a couple of million guys have tried it. The thought made me smile. And&iuml;&frac14;&OElig; squinting the other way through the steam and the smoke&iuml;&frac14;&OElig; I saw my father smiling back. I knew it wasn t my memory of my father that was smiling back at me--it was the part of my father that lives inside me.

My father has been gone for more than twenty years. I knew him pretty well; I was almost forty when he died. But my son&iuml;&frac14;&OElig;

Dylan&iuml;&frac14;&OElig; may not get to know me. I was in my fifties when Dylan was born&iuml;&frac14;&OElig; so even in the best of times I couldn t expect more than a score or so of years with him.
