Public concerns over youth violence have led to questions about how professionals can help parents whose children are at risk for becoming violent. In this highly readable volume, Timothy A. Cavell meets these questions head on. His innovative model of parent therapy -- responsive parent therapy -- is designed for families with aggressive school-age children. This model expands on and updates current parent-training programs that target primarily preschool children. Equipped with this comprehensive model of parent therapy, practitioners can better respond to the challenges inherent in assisting struggling parents and their aggressive children.
