How could late Qing China, a country bound largely by parochial ties of family, clan, and native place, produce a nationwide mass movement? Was this popular outburst symptomatic of a domestic "nationalist awakening," as historians of modern China claim, or a result of pressure from Chinese overseas suffering under harsh U.S. immigration laws, as students of American history contend? In considering these vying explanations for the boycott of American products, Wang identifies a coalition of interests that came together to shape the movement's strategy, objectives, and outcome. He explores the larger structural and organizational resources available to boycott organizers and participants and the role of this common experience in laying the groundwork for later reform and revolutionary movements.

书评

如果说1899-1900年的义和团事件是国人——尤其是下层民众——针对东西方列强“侵华”而作出的一次最激烈的回应，那么5年以后那场波及中国沿海大部分地区的抵制美货运动，则可以说是国内民众在面对同样危机时作出的相对理智的一次回应。在这场运动中，绅商、城市知识分子和青年...
