Daughter who has passed marriageable age leaves her car in her parental home where her mother lives alone, and moves to a large city. Her aged mother does not have a driver's license but makes a daily habit of polishing the car and starting its engine on behalf of her daughter, who returns home from time to time. An old man living nearby, who is concerned how she is taking care of the car, sometimes comes to see how she is doing. And a car salesman calls on her almost everyday...Iwamatsu sends a message of courage from elderly persons who live by themselves, a commonplace and familiar sight today, to the coming generation of people who will live in an aging society in the future.
