Introduction To Global Studies
Our Interdependent World
Today
Americans have business political and cultural ties throughout the world. At the same time studies show that most people who live in the United States know very little about the people and countries of other regions of the Earth. We should know more about other people. We should learn to appreciate the great achievements of their cultures. Culture refers to the total way of life of a group. There is great need to establish cross-cultural connections. We must empathize with others problems and needs if we are to work together in a global effort to solve common problems.
The Physical World
We must try to understand the historical political social and economic developments of the people of other global regions. There are differences in the physical and human environment (the setting in which people live) but human needs are very similar. Regions A region is a part of the globe with some common physical, political, cultural and/or economic features. A region could be a whole continent or parts of several continents. For instance the Middle East combines parts of Asia and Africa. We will study seven global regions: Africa, South and Southeast Asia, East Asia, Latin America, The Middle East, Western Europe, and Russia, Eastern Europe and Central Asia.
