It was a sunny day in early summer. Paddington Station was jammed with people and bristling with activity. Britain and Germany were at war, and many children in London were being sent to stay in inland towns and villages, away from the bombings. Among them was Randolph Pearce, seven years old.

Randolph lived with his mother in Kensington Gardens. His father was a first lieutenant in the Royal Armoured Corps, stationed somewhere in North Africa.

Florence Pearce led her son through the crowded waiting room and onto the train that would take him to West Northrup, where he would live with his Uncle Edward and Aunt Beatrice. She helped Randolph find a seat and made sure that his belongings were in order. She kissed his cheek, and for a long moment looked at him- as though memorizing his face. Then she was gone. Randolph peered through the window to find her and wave, but the train was already moving. His journey had begun.
