Most renowned of all extinct wild cats are the sabre-tooth tigers , named for their dagger-like upper canine teeth. These formidable weapons were probably capable of felling young adult elephants, something no present-day animal can do. From about

35 million years ago, the sabre-tooths were widespread in Europe, Asia, Africa and North America (and subsequently also in South America), evolving as a separate line from the cats that survive today. They used their teeth to stab their prey and not to bite as modern cats do. Their relatively small brains, heavy bodies and cumbersome jaws may have helped to push them into extinc-
