I admit it. The questions that follow are transparently anthropomorphic. Cats aren't interested in explanations. They don't want to know whether neutering will affect their personality, if acupuncture will alleviate pain, why their teeth chatter when a bird lands on the windowsill or why they spray the walls with urine when the new baby is brought into their home. They're simply interested in comfort, security, mental and physical stimulation and, most of all, survival. Cat people, on the other hand, are always asking vets questions. So why should I put words in cats mouths?

The simple answer is because it is fun, but there is a subtler reason, too; my family's relationship with our cat, Millie, exemplifies it. My wife, Julia, had never lived with a cat. She was raised with dogs, ardently loved dogs and may well have married me so that she would have in-resident veterinary assistance for her own dog.

After Millie, a silver tabby kitten, arrived in our home, I would come back from work to find Julia nestled in a corner of the sofa with a sleeping kitten on
