On the morning of September 14, 1984, Barbara Mandrell awoke on a natural high. She had several hit records, hundreds of sold-out concerts, a smash television show, a fan club 10,000 members strong, and her first movie scheduled for release that month.

The next day she regained consciousness in a hospital bed--crippled, her memory gone. A near-fatal highway accident seemed to have stripped her of her dreams. The world said her career was over. But the world was wrong. Still intact was Barbara's will to survive and climb ever upward. Drawing on a boundless determination and abiding faith in God and the American public, she worked, through the pain and despair--and climbed to the top again.

This is a moving account of one woman's rise to fame, and of her struggle to retain that fame when a devastating accident nearly wrested it from her. Skillfully told in intimate detail, Charles Paul Conn's examination of Barbara's life and career confirms that in the eat- em-up world of show business, not only does Barbara Mandrell survive, she triumphs.
