An old theory, by now a cliche, has it that artists are nobodies when not practicing their art. Most often this is applied to actors.

play is over, and starts to sparkle again the next evening when the curtain rises.

Reading "The Difference between Night and Day" I'm reminded of this theory, not because I suspect Ramke is a blob of any sort, but because his poems are so honestly rooted in isolation that they suggest a man with no way of reaching others except through his writing.
