America is a land in which sometimes it seems that there are few moral heroes, a country lacking men and women who inspire others to walk in righteous paths. Even saying this sounds dated. That is how much has been lost in this country. Where may one turn for moral example? These are times, sad to say, when many Americans bestow their admiration not on the quiet exemplars who labor patiently attending to matters of the soul, but on those who attain material success, those who command the attention of the media. Glitz and glitter are the order of the day.

Once religion could be counted on to produce exemplars whose deeds filled others with hope and inspiration, people who caused the spirits of others to soar and, by example, invited emulation. In some places on earth that still can happen. In South Africa, Archbishop Desmond M. Tutu stood as a tower of strength against apartheid. In East Germany, a few Protestant ministers provided much of the moral resistance in the late 1980s for the revolt that finally led to the collapse of a totalitarian regime. And even in Romania it was ultimately the pastor of a provincial church who became an unlikely hero in the overthrow of a hated dictator.
