Whether she is discoursing on growing up in Brooklyn with immigrant parents searching for the American dream—the myths of race and class so pervasive in the American psyche—her formation as a writer confronting the romance of the individual artist—Martin Luther King Jr. and Jesse Jackson—the poverty of American education—the fall of Mike Tyson—or Anita Hill’s testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee—June Jordan is always incendiary. Her writing is all of it remarkable for its preternatural clarity. Here are essays that constitute a major writer’s manifesto of hope—anger—and visionary power.
