Late in the afternoon Clair Louise Faulkner stood in the middle of her studio apartment facing the elongated mirror on her closed bathroom door. Sunlight saturated the windows behind her windows which had drawn her to this particular place. They raised her spirits daily with their view of peaceful hills lined with tidy houses. She wore a pale purple body suit. Her mother would have told her to avoid anything that showed her bulges the way this did; however her mother had been dead for over a year and Clair was redefining her life rethinking her priorities. Jes. Pulling yards of transparent lavender gauzy fabric out of a paper bag she draped it around her shoulders with a flourish chin raised in a gesture which was either triumphant or belligerent. She had lived on her own in a strange city for over a year now. Soon she would be thirty-six.

 She bunched the material one way¼ then another¼ won-lered what her dad would have said about all this. She imag-ened him shaking his head¼ perplexed¼ relighting his pipe and >ticking up his paper.
 Stretching to see over her shoulder she wished she had >:nother mirror¼ found a small one and examined the view of >Ler backside. The effect she wanted was slowly coming to-ether.
 From another bag she pulled a dark plum-colored tutu¼ >tepped into it and pulled it up around her hips. She had >¼een such a good girl for so many years¼ such a good daugh>er¼ coming back after college first to take care of her stroke>lowed father¼ t aen both parents. They d been so different¼
