JOB HUNTING . . .
IN THE INFORMATION AGE
Looking for a new job can be a frustrating endeavor. Despite encouraging statistics that indicate healthy economic growth and the addition of new jobs, competition for employment remains fierce as millions of qualified and eager contenders flood the job market. A single help-wanted advertisement in the Sunday newspaper often yields hundreds of resumes from suitable applicants. At the same time, new electronic technologies are changing our methods of communication--and job hunting is no exception. Employers are embracing electronic technologies as a means of recruiting and attracting the most suitable job candidates. For instance, a job opening posted on the Internet can receive a response within minutes and from interested jobseekers from around the globe. This
