CHAPTER 1
It was raining again. This was going to be a wet winter in south>ern California. Since the official begining of the rainy season >two months ago in September they had had four heavy storms.
>In the big square communal detective ofice on the second floor >of Glendale Police headquarters the tall windows streamed >grayly and all the strip fluorescent lighting was on. At his desk next to Delia Varallo was reading a report. Leo >Boswell was typing one a couple of desks away >cussing now and then at the typewriter. Evoucbody else was out somewhere.
>Delia was listening to Mrs. Grace Phillips.
>\"I tell you Miss--what did you say-- Riordani that poor girl >never had a chance. See she opened up to me I heard the >whole story. She never had a damned chance. Raised on a farm >some place in Kansas for God s sake and never seen a town bigger than the wide place in the road she went to school runs away to Hollywood on the bus with the idea she d get the swell modeling job next dayi¼Œ people always said she was pretty enough to be a movie starpmy God!\ " Grace Phillips was a hard-faced blonde by request somewhere in her fifties; she looked as if life had used her hardi¼Œ but she had her head screwed on the fight way and had kept a sense of humor and a warm heart. \ "Haven t we all heard the story before!\ " \ "Yesi¼Œ\ " said Delia. \ "Did she tell you anything about Jerry Rubio?\ " \ "Ohi¼Œ you know his name. Maybe I m not telling you nothing you don t know? Welli¼Œ the cops are smart these days.\ " Grace Phillips stubbed out her cigarette in the ashtray on Delia s desk.

Her expression was brooding. \ "These poor damned silly kids.
Yeahi¼Œ she told me the whole storyi¼Œ she needed a shoulder to cry on-- I told you she d just got hired at the place I worki¼Œ Chris s Night Owl Care on San Fernandoi¼Œ and middle of the evening it s
