Chapter 1
Autumn was the most beautiful time of the year at Beaumont. In late October the leaves had not finished falling and the massive beech trees around the house were still in full color. When Isabel Cunningham came to work as Charles Schriber's secretary three years earlier it had been in the middle of a blazing Kentucky summer. By the time September came she was his wife. It was four o'clock and she had been out walking with her husband's favorite terrier; they had gone through the wood at the north side of the grounds. The little dog had scampered through the leaves, barking and bustling around, looking for rabbit holes. Isabel followed slowly after him. The wood was dim and peaceful, with lovely paths that in April were full of spring flowers. The sunlight filtered through the trees, making bright patterns ather feet. Charles loved to walk there with her and to go onand inspect the paddocks where the mares and foals wereout at grass. It was too late to see them that afternoon; theywould have been brought in for the night. She called the dogand came out into the sunlight¼ taking the way aroundthrough the large formal gardens at the rear of the house.Her husband hadn t been interested in the gardens; he was
