CHAPTER ONE
>Annie Clark opened the door to the old-fashioned drugstore.She loved the sound of the tinkling bell hanging from an ancientnail at the corner of the door. For one brief second she wonderedif she could steal the little cluster of bells. Noï¼ better to tucktile sound into her memory bank.How she loved this little store. She sniffed as she alwaysdid when she entered. The smell was always tile same--MaxFactor powderï¼ Chantilly perfumeï¼ and the mouthwateringaroma of fleshly brewed coffee from the counter tucked inbetween the displays of Dr. Scholl s foot products and theNature s brand vitamins.She d worked here five days a week for the past six years.She knew every item on every shelf as well as the price. Thanksto Elmo Richardson s mother s recipeï¼ she knew how to makeand serve the best tuna salad in the world to the students ofBoston University. On the days she served cinnamon coffeeand the tuna on a croissant¼ the lines outside the store wentaround the block. Yes¼ she was going to miss this place.
