CHAPTER 1
Marriage Opportunities
It had been a full but satisfying day. As my last two patients left the office I loosened my tie unbuttoned my collar and leaned back at my desk to catch my breath before heading home. Eight solid hours of counseling was draining work yet I wasn't quite ready to call it a day. I wanted to review the cases I had handled. I thought about my first appointment with a young woman who had been married only two years. Joan complained about the loss of love and affection for her husband. She was infatuated with a fellow employee and wanted to know if God could lead her out of her present marriage and into another one. As I probed I learned how she was deeply hurt by her husband's inability to attend to her emotional needs. As a result she had built a wall around herself and gradually the warm loving feelings for him had deteriorated. She hadn't gone looking for an affair but the fellow employee had tried to help her and in the process they had fallen in love. It didn't take long for me to realize that Joan was in an Active-Passive marriage relationship with elements of a Kid's marriage also present. She was frustrated that her husband would not take an active role in the relationship and her immaturity had led her to look elsewhere for fulfillment. As I reviewed with her the dynamics of a third-party relationship I explained that--based on my years of experience as a counselor--the likelihood of it succeeding was remote. Also she would miss out on a significant opportunity for personal development if she escaped from her marriage relationship. When our hour was up she agreed to bring her husband with her to the next appointment.
