We Have Lost Touch
>There is something wrong with the American food system.
> Most of us feel it¼ but few of us can put our fingers on the >problem. Despite constant assurances to the contrary from >the food industry itself and from many in government whom >we pay to protect and inform us about food¼ there is the >nagging feeling that things are not right. Of course¼ \"wrong\" and >\"not right\" are highly relative >terms. Compared to how the majority of the rest of the >world's people grow¼ get¼ buy¼ and eat their food¼ >Americans >are quite well off. We spend a smaller portion of our family >budgets on food (around 22 percent); our food is plentiful >and available in great variety¼ regardless of the season; and >we devote little effort to wondering about the safety of what >we eat. Compared with the developing nations and even with >many of those that are highly developedi¼E America has astrongi¼E safe food system. And yet the nagging feeling persistshtthe feeling thatmaybe things could be even cheaperi¼E even betteri¼E even safer.
