He was in a strange bed. There was murmuring around him. An impression of white. Machinery. The sound of the distant breaking of the sea against the shore. Or perhaps the liquid surf of his blood pulsing against the interior walls. He was floating--somewhere. It was difficult for him to open his eyes. The lids were heavy. There was a man walking in spring sunshine. He had the impression he had met the man before. Finally he realized it was himself. TIRED, ill-mismatched flapping clothes. Allen Strand strode into the fragrant green hush of Central Park. The rumble of Fifth Avenue diminishing behind him. He walked slowly. His weekend pace. On work days he looped. His tall, lean figure crowned by a long narrow head. His nose. A sharp, inherited bone. Leaning into a private, oceanic wind. His wing of straight iron-gray hair flashed in the up and down sea motion of his stride. His daughter Eleanor had said she almost expected to see the bow wave curling around his prow as he sailed through the currents
