The telephone rang at six a.m. like an alarm hurled across the room. It was still dark outside. Audrey had always known the call would come while she was sleeping; very bad news has a way of arriving in the night. The accident was muted and sober as terrible as car accidents go slow-moving metal and chrome remaining intact. Audrey's father had been an excellent driver at one time able to negotiate the mountain passes and narrow roads where they lived in winter snow piled high as an overpass but since he retired his sight and his reactions had dimmed. He had a tendency to sit behind the wheel slumped to one side as though he wasn't driving but watching television. Audrey's mother said she worried that he would pull out into oncoming traffic one day. But he kept on driving and she let him: it was
