One Lights glittered below them and out across the myriad run-ways where the big birds swooped gently down and other big birds soared upward into the blue night. The truly exceptional one was waitingi¼ looking like a vast bird of preyi¼ its tremendous beak ready to swoop across the dark Atlantic.
The windows in the dining room were large and offered a wide viewi¼ but must have been soundproofedi¼ for they heard very little of the enormous engines coming and going. Small white trucks skittered like bugs here and therei¼ busily carrying food. Fitz ordered a martini for each of them.
Sarah said slowlyi¼
"How long have you known about this?"
Fitz leaned toward her. "Since I was told to take Bill s place."
"You didn t tell me."
"I couldn t. Orders.
Nothing over the phone. Nothing of the reason for my going to Liguria. But I had to see you. I had to tell you.\"

\"That s why you sounded--ohi¼E so different when you talked to me.\"
