 Women of today have opportunities never imagined by their historical counterparts. Educational barriers have been lifted employment options continue to expand and men have become increasingly supportive of women pursuing their goals. It would seem that this generation of women has no limit to its opportunities for success in any area. However, the changing role of women in our society during the last two decades has thrust many into a state of personal crisis. Disillusioned by the feminist movement's empty promises of fulfillment and frustrated by their inability to satisfy society's expectations, many of today's women are desperately struggling. Career women struggle to balance the strength and assertiveness required of them in the workplace with the gentleness and sensitivity required of them at home. Women who have chosen to work in the home battle the stigma attached to being ajmere
