I was the only woman on my street who had never had a Cuisinart or a hysterectomy. Or even an affair. I felt there was something wrong with me. When I mentioned my anxiety to my friends and family they all agreed that there was. Several winked knowingly: "You're thirty-eight and neither you nor Bert has ever come to you, you're kidding." Our doctor advocated hysterectomies as a routine procedure; that "damned thing" would be causing me trouble soon. But I had gone to see him for poison ivy and I decided major surgery wasn't called for. My friend Judy said, "Why don't you just get a Cuisinart? You'll love it." "No I won't," I said. "I've just had the kitchen redone. For the first time in my life it's thinking of having it sealed off." completely clean and I'm "Then you'd better get a college degree." /That was the other thing I didn't have that most of my friends were into. I thought of all those paintings and drawings stacked in the basement; the ones I'd done while the children were small. I'd never taken them to a dealer or even entered them in a show but had always vaguely thought of them as leading to a career-someday in the future. I just threw all my old magazines and clippings away
