CHAPTER I
The policeman on duty at the desk heard sobbing long before the woman came into sight. He was able to follow her progress down the corridor by the increasing audibility of the sobs. He knew with the sad resignation of a man long accustomed to the blows of a malicious fate that she was heading straight for him. And he was alone on duty right now. Saturday was always a bad day in this district - although not usually so early in the day - and his usual morale raiser didn't always help. He had spent long hours working out and reworking the sums. But there were too many years to go until he reached retirement - decades in fact. He fell back on his secondary source of inner strength: how much longer could it be until his transfer finally came through? This district would be the death of him. The sobs were closer.
