Chapter 1.
HE WAS STANDING under a white-gold sky with brown shale under his feet.
Russell's image smiled. His red hair was a mane of curls around his white face. Emerald earrings matched the bright green of his eyes. He was holding out a hand in welcome. The illusion was perfect. Jimson's heartbeat quickened. He curled his fingers around the cold hard visicube until the edges bit into his palm.
When he opened the fist the image had not changed. It looked at him from arm's length, clear and small as far away as the past.
He heard Raina's step outside the cubicle and shoved the cube into a pocket. She came through the sliding door, her dark hair set off by her white Senior's smock.
"Well?" he asked impatient to be gone.
"All negative. I don't know. why you think you're sick." She always made the same joke.

\"Same prescription?\" he asked. Not that it mattered. He d been on the damn drugs all his life without knowing even their names.
\"Exactly the same. It s holding you well.\" She flipped the drug disc to him; he picked it from the air. It
