THE FIRST THING she noticed that morning was the Christmas decorations. Walking the picturesque sleepy block from the bargain place to her shop Abby wondered how many little Oxnard elves it had taken to bring about the festive transformation since she'd left work the evening before. Someone in this small coastal town just north and a little west of Los Angeles had been way too busy. She could hardly believe what she was seeing. It wasn't even Thanksgiving yet and smiling plastic Santas were flapping in the breeze. Perhaps they were fitting those reminders of the upcoming holidays. They'd appeared like magic--but then people who believed in Santa Claus believed in magic and usually in dreams too. Abby's dream was about to come true. It just wasn't her dream anymore. It never had been hers. It had always been their dream. She and hersisters. All three of them. Together. From the momentof their conception t~ ey d been together. Shared ev-erything. The dream had been no different.But the other two were gone now. One dead. Andone so unreachable she almost felt dead to Abby.>Two-thirds of the dream was dead.
