Occupational education is a term used by educators for programs that prepare men and women for technical and semiprofessional jobs in engineering fields of service, health related work, public service, fire and police protection, retailing, secretarial and other business-related work.

Occupational education may be recognized as three separate and distinct situations. It may be training for the presently unemployed adult, the teenage dropout, the culturally disadvantaged who has never held a regular job, or it may be retraining required for the mature person who has been displaced by new technology. On the other hand, occupational training is for the young man or woman still in school. Such instruction and training prepares individuals for the day they complete school and enter the labor force. Finally, there is the continuing training programs essential for all to remain qualified to meet ever changing technological demands and to enable individuals to advance to better paying positions.
