"Please can you help me? Please? I've just been murdered."

Detective Daniel Parks missed a step, sloshing coffee over his hand. Fortunately, the coffee maker had turned itself off an hour before. He wiped the lukewarm liquid onto his pants and turned toward the front desk.

"I mean, I'm not dead, but I might have I mean, someone just tried to kill me."

The woman clutching the front counter, stammering her story to Nancy Dennis, the department receptionist, did not look like a crank. Except for her mahogany-colored hair, which frizzed around her head like the mane of a Shih Tzu having a bad-hair day, she reminded Daniel of a young Audrey Hepburn--finely sculpted features, porcelain-smooth skin, and dark, earnest eyes that hinted at mischief. She was beautiful.

Daniel grimaced. He'd have preferred a crank. Twenty more minutes of paperwork and he'd be through with this long, miserable day, sitting at home watching the Oakland-Chicago game while he reheated last night's spaghetti. He already knew the As had won, four to two. Everyone in the department knew he taped the As games, and they delighted in spoiling the suspense for him. But he watched the games anyway. The complex geometry of baseball untangled his mind from the stress of his job.

This day had been even more stressful than most. Before he d finished his first cup of coffee, he d been called to a domestic dispute that had escalated to attempted homicide, with the wife-beater being transported to the hospital with a
