Now more than ever before there is an increased focus upon the quality and cost of health care. The delivery of health care is being shared by many persons with different types of preparation, and, while responsibilities of health care workers are broadening, the differences among roles are more difficult to determine.

Professional and technical nurses, in diagnosing and treating human responses to actual or potential health needs, are constantly being challenged to help patients and their families prevent illness and respond to physical and emotional stress. In doing so nurses function as coordinators of care and patient advocates. Education for these roles requires a basic theoretical and technical background that will provide the skills and competencies necessary to continually improve nursing care, responding to the increasing complexity of health care.
