An examination of the statistical evidence of black progress in this country reveals that the number of blacks now categorized in the professional or managerial class is steadily increasing. In the face of this, many non-blacks resent the continued charge of racism and often feel that blacks have been overcompensated to the point where it is the non-black who is discriminated against. There have been suggestions along these lines from all areas: from the poor white person who feels that the white-shirted black with the attached case is making progress on his back, to government officials who recommend the discontinuance of programs designed to help blacks with the suggestion that some kind of benign neglect will facilitate the closing of the racial social and economic gap. Jonathan Bramwell, the author of Courage in Crisis, clearly refutes this theory, and tells of the
