In this twenty-third installment of the Commander John Coffin series, Gwendoline Butler weaves a story of intrigue and deception with her usual finesse. John Coffin, unusually pleased with his mercurial wife, is feeling quite content with married life. However, one day a phone call disrupts his peace of mind and starts him on a journey from past to present.

Dr. John Bradshaw is a scholar who is writing a book on the life of Richard Lavendar, a former prime minister, long retired and almost forgotten. When he enlists Coffin's help to research his subject, Coffin uncovers a deadly secret. On a visit to Lavendar, he hears the respected politician confess that his father was a serial killer, and that as a boy he had helped to bury one of the victims, Lavendar, on his deathbed, is repentant and requests that Coffin find the body.

Unsure whether the story is true or the elderly man is delusional, Coffin sets off to investigate. When a young journalist who has been digging around in Lavendar's past is murdered, it appears that the sins of the past and present are coming together with terrifying speed.
