1933 Bagheria, Sicily

Dottore Amendola stood quietly behind the glass pane of his office doorway watching his breath patterns on the cold window. He rubbed his hands together behind his back, idly massaging first one soft finger, then another.

Corso Umberto was empty. Two wooden carts, each headed by a small ass, caught his eye at the half-shuttered vineria across the street at the corner.

He turned back through his reception room, stopping to kneel heavily before the Madonna, then his squat figure passed comfortably under the low doorway into his office. He crOssed to a marble sink against the wall. Carefully he roiled
