Here is one of the brightest, most engaging novels yet by a master of science fiction, an author recognized here and abroad for his distinctive comic flair and boundless imagination. It tells of Alistair Crompton, a vintage Sheckley hero on the most quixotic search of all--in quest of his personality.

As Chief Tester for Psychosmell, inc., a world monopoly controlling the production and sale of exotic psychedelic fragrances, Crompton would seem to be in an enviable position within a society that has become dependent upon olfactory stimulation. He is, however, a tortured soul--in effect one-third of himself, having been separated at an early age from two other conflicting personalities inside his mind. Installed in different host bodies and dispatched to two distant planets, these other Alistairs have developed separate lives. Now in middle age, the original Alistair has located them and has hatched an improbable scheme to reintegrate himself. He risks the notorious wrath of his employer to defraud Psycbosmell of the funds needed to send him on a quest to those two worlds where live the other disparate parts of his psyche--Loomis, as grossly self-indulgent and amoral as Alistair is abstentious and prim; and Stack, as vicious and impulsive as Alistair is meek and cautious.
