Meet Nathaniel Danzon, a psycho-therapist who treats animals with emotional problems. On any day a fox, an owl, or an army of ants may crouch, perch, or crowd upon Nat's office couch. There is the honey bee complaining of claustrophobia from living with too many bees in the hive; a pacifist Doberman who runs away from his master so that he will not have to be trained to kill; Gib, the half-wild cat, who suffers from having been abandoned by his human family; a raccoon with an inferiority complex; a swan upset at having lost his mate; and many other case histories.

All these animals suffer from the stereotypes and misconceptions humans have been making up ever since Aesop's Fables, which have created neuroses Nat calls "Aesophobias."

Danzon became a psychotherapist in order to communicate with animals
