D. M. Thomas s seventh novel is a brief and brutally funny comedy in which an American president and a Soviet premier cross swords (and signals) at a surprise summit meeting. At stake is world peace, at issue is a state-of-the-art American defensive missile system--and if the premise sounds familiar, it's because life is imitating art.

Summit, of course, is fiction.

As the novel opens, a red-haired, eternally youthful American chief executive--a former movie star, who suffers from an inattention to detail (as well as from a perceptual difficulty called "logotarditis," which causes the sufferer to answer the question preceding the one just asked) is being threatened with impeachment as the result of a bumbling interview. To distract national attention from his lapses, President O'Reilly and his aides formulate a new global nuclear
