Don Robak--the small-town criminal lawyer who prefers sleuthing to civil cases--is back in the latest of Joe L. Hensley's highly acclaimed crime novels. Robak's old friend and colleague Judge Steinmetz needs his help in the worst way: a $50,000 ransom note for his estranged daughter has landed him in a hospital bed, paralyzed with a stroke.

And there are those who are looking to see him stay there...permanently. He hasn't seen his daughter since she disappeared into the drug scene twelve years ago at the age of nineteen, and the only way he can save himself and his daughter is to call on Robak's talents.

The search for Gail Marie Steinmetz leads Robak into the sleazy netherworld of pimps, hustlers, and junkies who live in the tenderloin district of Capitol City, but the trail gets hotter away from the big city as he is drawn to his boyhood town of Bington.

As he gets closer to the answers, the questions start getting dangerous. The people involved in drug-trafficking and the local politicos are starting to look alike and it's getting hard to tell the difference between the good guys and the bad guys. Robak finds himself fighting for his life on his own turf and he's not sure who the winner will be.
