Detective Chief Inspector Harry Fathers of Scotland Yard's Serious Crimes Squad is articulate, canny, tenacious and one step ahead of his so-called superiors. He runs his squad with a firm hand, juggling as many cases in a day as there are hours, and laces his impeccable integrity with a strong dose of irreverence.

When Whitehall summons him it's for a briefing on the disappearance of Dr. Michael Sampson, a British research scientist on loan to a New York-based think tank. Sampson has disappeared. Since he was working on satellite technology--specifically SDI, or "Star Wars"--White-hall wants some answers, and they send Fathers to New York to get them.

"Given his work," says the steely-eyed man from the Home Office, "his disappearance must be a crime, and the list of possible perpetrators begins with the KGB and gets more outlandish from there."

In New York, Fathers finds that the situation involves the FBI as much as the NYPD. The "official" line is that Sampson dropped out of sight of his own accord; unfortunately all of his papers have also disappeared in a series of "co-incidental" burglaries. Cover up seems to be the name of the game.
