William Warner, wine merchant and bon viveur, is the sort of man who doesn't get shot at--in the normal course of events, that is. With a well-established business in London, a country house in France, a tres chic French wife and a delightful mistress, William has every reason to expect life to be comfortable, if a little dull at times. So when a sniper takes a potshot at him on a lonely Dartmoor track, William decides to throw caution and common sense to the wind and find out why.

In addition to his considerable charm and humor, our hero is in possession of two slender clues to the mystery-his would-be assassin had muttered something about "the man from the Ministry" and in his getaway had abandoned a flashlight with a Ministry of Defense serial number stamped on it. After enlisting the help of a somewhat reluctant old school friend with connections in high places, Warner embarks on an investigation that will take him from the hallowed portals of the Athenaeum to the murky waters of the British Channel, from the cozy seclusion of his London flat to the Porton Down defense establishment, and from civilized middle age to a life of high adventure, desperate gambles, and beautiful women.
