A grand-scale novel spanning four decades, Traditions is the celebration of the family that is America--and the family that is Tiernan.

At the center of Traditions are the two Tiernan sisters, Carolyn---beautiful, religious, and principled--and Margaret--spunky, sexy, and irreverent. Different as two sisters born of the same Tradition can be, they are drawn to all corners of the earth as their talents, drives, and desires lead them from the sound stages of heyday Hollywood to the time-worn "boards" of Broadway; from London's West End theatres to the exotic art world of postwar Paris. They live, love, and work behind the footlights, the klieg lights, the cameras, and are seen on the television screens of America and the world. Each sister raises a family. There are four children, each different, with dreams and desires all his own. Yet the Tiernan Tradition remains the unbreakable thread that weaves through the patterns of their lives and three generations from the Depression and war years; from the frantic fifties to the sexy, turbulent sixties and seventies.

With drama and verve, Traditions chronicles the lives of this theatrical family that is tied together, even kept alive, by its Traditions.

Alan Ebert's rich prose and Janice Rotchstein's exhaustive research combine to create a rare and compelling novel.
