There never was and never will be anything like Newport in 1912. Women squandered millions in fierce competition for social ascendancy, men made fortunes and lost them over a glass of brandy, and love was as cheap as a servant's wages.

Or so Ainelia Leighton had learned a decade ago when she had to marry against her will an English nobleman. It was a fir exchange, the Fonr Hundred agreed- Amelia s dowry tor the duke s title. But the duke had turned ont to he anything but fair, and in Newport, divorce could be as expensive as marriage.

Bnt then everything in Newport was expensive. Samuel Van Nest s services, for example, would cost thirty-five million. That was the price he had given J. P. Morgan for winning over-or breaking-five of the most powerful men in American finance.
