People who give books to graduates are probably the same people who give underwear to children for Christmas. Let's be honest. You didn't want a book. After all, you have just finished high school, and you have read about all the books you will ever need to read, and you have learned about everything you will ever need to know. Why would you want another book?

I agree with you. If I could give you a gift, I would give you a T-shirt instead of a book. But not just any T-shirt. I would give you one of those T-shirts with your philosophy of life ~tten across its front so the whole world can see exactly what you are feeling, thinking, and believing just now.

I am a big fan of T-shirt wisdom. In fact, I am a fan of wisdom anywhere I can get it. I even enjoy locker-room wisdom, the kind that comes printed on those posters that coaches plaster around the locker room with huge globs of tape.

Where else would I have learned such life-changing gems as, "When the going gets tough, the tough get going" or "Only the guy who hits the ball over the fence can loaf around the bases"?

I also enjoy classroom bulletin-board wisdom--the kind that enriches my horizons with such truths as, "Since your mother isn't here, clean up your own mess" and "Time passes; will you?" And then there's the ever popular, "If you can read this, thank a teacher." But since teachers and coaches don't change their billboards except once every decade or two, I sometimes wonder if they are really personally committed to that message or are just using those things to cover a crack in the wall.
