Six leading social scientists from Western countries and Yugoslavia spent nearly three years discussing social, economic and cultural conflicts of the modern world and how they can be alleviated. The resulting document is a major statement on the crises we face in contemporary society.

Each of the six contributorsmRudi Supek (Yugoslavia), Hans Peter Dreitz~l (West Germany), Serge Moscivici (France), Richard Sennett (UIS.), Norman Birnbaum (U.S.), Alain Touraine (France) --is a prominent intellectual in his country. What emerges from their essays is a common assumption that the most fundamental categories of the contemporary social, cultural and political experience no longer correspond to the existing situation in the world.

Current ideas no longer function as they should. Neither scientific nor partisan, the six authors attempt to set directions for the future, to boldly suggest ways in which we can go "beyond the crisis" and establish a Society better able to deal with today's problems.

The authors share a hope for democratization of economic and social structures. They also share cultural values, a belief in human autonomy and creativity, and their work bespeaks respect for cultural tradition.

Together, the thoughts and proposals of these six important figures provide the elements of a new analysis which could give us new categories of social thought.
